Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a novel anthranilamide derivative, a phototherapeutic composition containing the same, a phototherapeutic method for treating hypoxic cell tumor, and a therapeutic agent for the treatment of leukemia. 2. Description of the Related Art A variety of low molecular weight photosensitizers have been reported so far. Although the sensitization mechanism of the low molecular weight photosensitizers is not clear, it is considered that the low molecular weight photosensitizer is oxidized by the action of singlet oxygen (hereinafter abbreviated as "1O2") generated in the sensitized photosensitizer by irradiation with light, and thus generates a highly reactive free radical or radical anion which is the reactive species for damaging the biological target molecule. Examples of the biological target molecule are enzymes, such as prostaglandin synthetase, enzyme protein, various membrane bound receptors, and enzymes related to DNA or RNA synthesis, such as DNA topoisomerase I, II, III, and IV. These low molecular weight photosensitizers are extremely low in the quantum yield of 1O2 generation, and when they are applied to phototherapy, it is necessary to administer a large amount of the photosensitizer, thereby raising a problem in the therapy. On the other hand, a variety of high molecular weight photosensitizers have been reported. Of these, a method of the therapy in which a malignant cell having a high intracellular content of hemoglobin, such as erythrocyte, is preferentially destroyed by photochemical reaction using high molecular weight photosensitizers has been reported (Japanese Patent Publication Nos. 38-1706 and 48-6983). However, the hemoglobin content in a mal
