The post-acute rehabilitation industry has been under intense scrutiny for years because of the decrease in long-term care insurance reimbursement levels and the general lack of quality medical services. In addition to these external pressures, acute care facilities have increased their rates for specialty skilled nursing services to ensure profitability in the face of an increasingly competitive health care marketplace. However, the long-term care industry is also benefitting from the move toward more managed care, which has facilitated the development of several standard monitoring programs to allow for better services and better quality care for patients. As a result, the industry is focusing more on quality of care than ever before, and reimbursement rates are increasing to reflect this trend. Hospitals and post-acute health care providers need to focus on leadership that can create collaboration between the groups and across disciplines to produce patients who are well and will keep coming back as they learn to use their newly acquired skills and learn to take an active part in their own care.
