The traditional definition of a curve is that it is a path which always lies on a plane and its curvilinear coordinates changes continuously. But when I change the expression of its curvilinear coordinates in the formula of its tangent at a point, the curve turns into a surface and I can not explain the effect as so. In fact, this question has already been asked in this SEP but it has no satisfactory answer. I need to know the reason why a curve is a curve when the underlying geometric object is a curve? A: For smooth surfaces, you can make a general coordinate transformation. You can work with the surface in a coordinate system where it is flat at a point and then you can perform the coordinate transformation. Q: Why are "I" and "me" used frequently in native English? I'm always surprised when I find most native English speakers using "I" or "me" frequently. I'm more of a native English speaker than a learner. It seems to me that we have more options for talking about "I". For example, I'm tired. I'm thirsty. I'm a friend. And for "me", I'm a friend. I'm a teacher. I'm a doctor. I'm a dog. Why do we use "I" or "me" so often? Are these the only options? If "I" and "me" are the only options, then how can we use "you" and "it" in most conversations? A: The key 09e8f5149f
