Q: Database Architecture for a Website I'm working on an ASP.Net website using mysql and using a Northwind model as my database design. I think that the structure I have right now is a good one: Anyway, when I make a change I run "mysqlcheck --auto-repair --all-databases" to make sure that all of my tables are valid. Well it seems to take a long time to run, and I'm wondering if there are some optimizations that can be made to the tables, and are there some tools out there that can help me as far as this goes. Any suggestions would be appreciated. Thanks A: mysqlcheck will only check the mysql version you installed, not all of them. It's also a nice idea to create an auto-backup script. It will save your database from corruptions and from other problems. But for your question about optimizing your database, you should first decide where you can optimize. If it's the tables and the rows, then you could use the INNODB engine and make your table in rows and it would be faster. If you want to use a clustered index, or if your database is a little big, then the InnoDB engine will be better. You should look at the following posts : Ok, now to your question, I don't think there are any database analyzers that you can use to check and optimize your database. That could be done by a tools like Ambiance or the DBA interface in Oracle. So as a last resort, you could export the tables of your database using the SQL script provided with MySQL and then use the SQLLoader program from Oracle. Hope that helped. NB: "For a small database, there will be no perceivable difference in execution time between InnoDB and MyISAM table engines." means that MySQL will run faster with InnoDB than MyISAM. In
