1. Field of the Invention The present invention generally relates to a drug delivery system, and particularly relates to a pulmonary drug delivery system that provides a constant rate of drug delivery to the pulmonary system over a prolonged period of time.
2. Description of the Related Art Many drugs are administered intravenously because the pulmonary system cannot absorb the drug orally. Specifically, drugs that would normally be absorbed through the alveolar walls of the lungs, including both small molecules and proteins, cannot do so since the alveolar walls are too thick. Intravenous administration of drugs presents numerous problems. For example, intravenous drug administration is potentially dangerous, cumbersome, and requires a healthcare professional to maintain the line, and further the trained professional may accidentally penetrate and/or sever the line, causing the patient to receive an excess or inadequate amount of drug. Liquids are absorbed rapidly through the pulmonary system because the fluids are small in size and are contained in micropores. Consequently, it has been discovered that aerosolized drug delivery systems can be designed which would administer the drug more rapidly than intravenous delivery, and would avoid the problems associated with intravenous administration. Drug delivery systems for delivering a drug to the pulmonary system have been suggested, and these systems are designed to deliver a specific drug for a specific type of lung disease. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 3,963,611 to Bickford, Jr. discloses a liquid aerosol containing a steroid for treating asthma and other such
