The digital platform allows individuals to sign up online, and US citizens can use it to obtain a British Virgin Islands ID card or a British Virgin Islands passport, while others can file their US tax returns online and have those papers sent to them. "This is a great opportunity to start your whole process from the beginning, and a great opportunity to get a permanent residence," said the commissioner of passports, Doreen Whitman, pointing to what the government calls a "digital passport." Users can find the online process detailed on the British Virgin Islands government website, which includes a video explaining how the new system works. In a news release, the government revealed the launch of the registry was triggered by a US Supreme Court decision earlier this year that struck down much of a previous law that had prohibited residents of the BVI from becoming citizens of the United States. The new law, passed by the territory's legislative assembly in December, allows for the BVI passport and identity card to be issued to US citizens. For their part, US citizens can use the system to apply for a British
