(VTR). More particularly, the invention relates to a system and method for capturing and storing the video and/or audio data on a VTR in order to provide an archival backup of the data, enabling the VTR to operate as a true backup when necessary. VTRs have been used for decades as a data capture and playback mechanism. In a typical configuration, a VTR is used to capture and store various data, such as digital video or audio data. The VTR is then used to play the data at a later time, usually as part of a system restoration process. One such system restoration process is the Event Restoration technique disclosed in commonly-owned U.S. Pat. No. 6,724,139, entitled "Event Restoration System and Method," incorporated herein by reference in its entirety. The VTRs used in these systems are typically dedicated and standalone devices that e79caf774b
