Pinnacle recently released Pinnacle Studio 20 and it is getting a lot of attention. Exercise-induced changes in the neural control of blood flow to and clearance from exercising muscle. We have used echo-planar imaging (EPI) and an arterial spin-labeling (ASL) technique to measure the changes in the neural control of blood flow to and from contracting muscle during muscle activation in humans. In seven healthy volunteers, we measured the magnetic resonance (MR) signal of blood flow in exercising muscle during ischemic (ischemic) occlusion of the common femoral artery and at the end of a 30-second period of sustained contraction of the quadriceps muscle group. The cerebral blood flow signal (CBF) was also measured. EPI imaging was performed before and after ischemia in the resting supine position. To quantify the neural control of blood flow, the ratio of signal changes in the femoral artery and in the quadriceps muscle during the contraction and the 5-minute postcontraction period was measured. In addition, the total CBF was measured in the resting supine position and during the exercise. All subjects tolerated the protocol well, with no pain or discomfort. Blood flow to the quadriceps muscle decreased in all seven subjects with ischemia during the contraction (2.2 +/- 0.2 ml/100 g). During the postcontraction period, blood flow to the quadriceps muscle increased back to normal (8.1 +/- 0.4 ml/100 g). Blood flow to the contracting muscles was increased during the postcontraction period by 4.5 +/- 2.0 ml/100 g. The ratio of the femoral artery and quadriceps muscle signals during the contraction was increased by a mean of 2.6 +/- 0.8 times. After the postcontraction period, this ratio decreased back to resting values. The ratio of CBF to quadriceps muscle during the contraction was increased by a mean of 2.7 +/- 0.8 times. The increases in blood flow to the quadriceps muscle were not related to increases in CBF at rest or during muscle activation. We conclude that there was an increase in the neural control of blood flow to contracting muscle, with a contribution from both vascular and neural mechanisms. The increase in the neural control of blood flow resulted in a
