Activation code: 9221AZSJKFHSEFLKLPJHQFBSKJHHH.Radio frequency (RF) testing of integrated circuits includes specific test type tests, such as temperature and voltage tests, and fault tests, such as structure tests and semiconductor device level functional tests. The functional tests are performed to verify that each of the structures formed on an integrated circuit operates normally. The objective of functional testing is to verify the functionality of a circuit that was designed and built as an IC in a semiconductor manufacturing facility. Functionality verification includes verifying that a circuit is performing the desired function as designed and that the circuit is behaving in accordance with its data sheet and/or specifications. Because the integration of the circuit is not complete, the circuit is not fully functional. Functional testing of the circuit can be accomplished on wafer, where there is a high degree of parallelism and the time for each test is short. As circuit integration is increased, the number of circuit elements increase, which causes the time for each test to increase. Consequently, functional testing of circuits as integrated devices becomes cost prohibitive due to the long test time. For example, if a circuit device is designed to test a thousand in a second, and the testing time is increased to a minute or more, the cost of the IC becomes excessive, and such testing becomes cost-prohibitive. Functional testing may be performed with test vectors of data. Because an integrated circuit is a complex device with millions of circuit elements and interconnections, the design of test vectors in order to accurately test the circuit is a complex task. Referring to FIG. 1, a typical test circuit is shown. A combinational circuit 1 is interconnected with a sequential circuit 2. A logic analyzer 3 receives and analyzes the output of combinational circuit 1 and sequential circuit 2. A test vector generator 4 generates a test vector that is input to the logic analyzer. The test vector may be a pattern, such as a binary 1, a binary 0, or a mix of the two. The test vector generator is controlled by a sequencing controller 5, which sends a control signal to the test vector generator. The test vector may be limited in number, for example, 20 to 100 test vectors per cycle of the sequencing controller. A computer or sequencer that generates a test vector, also called test pattern, is referred to as a pattern generator.
