Notify customer.Heroin Derived enkephalinase inhibitors can block pain evoked by chemotherapy or radiotherapy in a murine model. Chemotherapy- or radiotherapy-induced pain is often refractory to common analgesics, including opioids. It is, therefore, important to identify strategies to treat this difficult condition, in particular in cancer patients who are often heavily sedated and under general anaesthesia. While pain relief strategies aim to improve cancer patients' quality of life, other factors must be considered such as the potential hazards of anticancer drug side effects. Currently, there is little to guide physicians in the choice of appropriate analgesia. We have tested a novel approach to chemo- or radiotherapy-induced pain, based on the idea that the endogenous opioid system is activated in response to cancer pain. Our hypothesis was that an opioid antagonist, which by itself had no effect on tumour growth or treatment efficacy, could be combined with an anti-cancer agent to significantly alleviate its adverse side effects. To test this hypothesis, the opioid antagonist, FK 888 was tested in a murine model of chemotherapy- or radiotherapy-induced pain. As expected, a single subcutaneous injection of morphine (1 mg/kg) substantially reduced pain. When combined with intraperitoneal injection of the anticancer drug cisplatin (15 mg/kg), however, morphine lost its antinociceptive effect and became antinociceptive. The same phenomenon occurred when morphine was administered after radiotherapy. These results in mice show that an opioid derived analgesia is only effective when combined with chemotherapy or radiotherapy. Here, we propose that in cancer patients, 6d1f23a050
