Given two points x,y in the cartesian plane, we can see that there is a unique path from the point x to the point y . For \mathbb{R}^2 , since $x \lt y$ is a one-to-one relationship, then $\mathbb{R}^2 \cong \mathbb{R}^2$. But how can I show that the more

I have an application written in C#. It has some very intricate performance requirements and has not been optimized yet. This is a desktop application, if that makes any difference. I would like to make it a web application and port it to the web platform, but I am not sure where to start. Where can I get information on porting a desktop application to a web application? A: Take a look at ASP.NET and the .NET Framework. It's a framework for web applications, so it's as simple as porting a desktop application to a new platform (or perhaps a new version of an old platform.) I've been building a web app that talks to an RTD using one such connection (using a bunch of round-trips.) The data-intensive nature of the application isn't even an issue, it's trivial. If all you've got is the UI, using the framework shouldn't be a problem (though any web-specific quirks you run into). Most of you guys want to know my opinion on HDD vs SSDs - basically which one I prefer and why!

Now I've not been testing/benchmarking the new SSDs just yet (touching wood) as I'm still running a 500GB 7200rpm drive right now. It's an OCZ Vertex 500G so it does quite well on the benchmark tests I've seen but it's slow as hell. So this is more of a question of my personal preference. So in short, why do some people use the ssd and some people don't? Seek and you will find. Seriously, it's NOT because of speed and I agree with you on that, but there is a small
