Packages that include this game. India may be among the countries which have benefited most from advances in the study of aging and dementia, given its rapidly aging population, but, as a study in The Lancet Neurology has revealed, the country has not made the most of the opportunity. The Lancet is an academic journal that covers international health, but the new work, by researchers at the National Institute on Aging, the Institute of Psychiatry in the U.S. and St. Anne's University Hospital, made use of the most recent data, to illustrate how India has lagged behind when compared to other countries. While there are no precise numbers for India, the authors argue that the country is rapidly approaching the time when many of the macro-level changes and health consequences of the aging population will come into play. Carrying out a survey of more than 1,400 people of different regions and levels of income, the researchers found that while India is only the 10th most populated country in the world (and has an average life expectancy of just under 73 years), it has a similarly severe dementia crisis, with more than 1,000 people per million affected. "The prevalence of dementia in India is among the highest in the world, with almost one percent of the elderly population affected," said Sanjay Gupta, the article's lead author. "It is set to rise dramatically in the coming decades, with an estimated two million people currently affected." The survey involved interviews with the participants, as well as medical exams, to measure their cognitive abilities and general health, and to check for signs of dementia and other illnesses. While some parts of India tend to have more advanced levels of medical care, the researchers also determined that the country has one of the lowest levels of literacy, particularly in rural areas. "It would be more than five decades since such a survey has been published," he continued. "The participation rate for our survey was more than 80 percent. As a result, we believe the sample in this study is representative of the general population of India, and it is also representative of the general population in terms of age, gender, and
