Since joining the Creative Cloud, I see no reason to abandon my Lightroom subscription. The monthly fee of $24.99 is a bit more than its competitors but is small in comparison. And I can reuse Lightroom's catalog and data files on the other Creative Cloud members of my household, including my husband. Even though there is a one-time initial fee to purchase a new version of Lightroom, it is still a small price to pay for the benefits. For those who may not be familiar with the new Lightroom, at first glance, I may have told a bit of a tall tale. Lightroom is the application that allows you to not only edit your Photo Library, but also use it as a catalog application. Once inside of Lightroom, you can create, view, sort, and index its contents. It's your starting point and cache for all image files on your hard drive, accessible from any computer you have your account set up on. Your thumbnails are based on the sequence generated by Lightroom, with your image files sorted into their appropriate image and video sequence. Thumbnail views of your images are produced with the click of a mouse, meaning you can be viewing a large set of images on your computer screen quickly. XMP sidecar files (or embedded metadata) are used by Lightroom and by Adobe Bridge (and by any of my readers) when you publish files to social media sites like Facebook and Twitter. XMP (pronounced "cross mark") is a standard used by the major graphic-editing programs. Bridge, for instance, uses it to allow you to export your images to Twitter as well as Google+.

Adobe has all but dumped the idea that Photoshop is a subscription-based product, while acknowledging it's still a hobbyist tool. However, designers using the software may decide for themselves whether they're interested in continuing to pay the subscription fee.
