I usually like to show things in action, and how the app opened for this. The problem is, it always issues a warning on that first open about how I will be fine with that program and the agency it works with (Open Source on the left). So, what is the problem here? This is from last December. I didn't feel like doing too much Photoshop since the Creative Cloud had started to get a bit too irritating. Anyway, I load up Photoshop and get into this massive thing: Did you notice the big Adobe product there? This is a very big program. When opening, it says I can highly recommend this, which I did. The warning was on that first load. There were loads of warnings that I said I was all right with. They said I could install and go with it for very long while. So I did. Adobe's new app provides a strong package that can do just about anything you ask, but at a price. The iPad version continues to be pricey—$29.99 for the standard version and $49.99 for the Pro version. And that may indeed offer value compared to something like Corel's PaintShop Pro. And for now, there is the tension between the migration from the classic Photoshop CS4 and CS5 formats to the new DP4 and DP5 ones. You probably won't see the DP4s come with an app update for a while—or perhaps ever. And the timeline is so long. The free Photoshop Touch app remains another option, but it's been in beta for a few versions and not yet all that great. Photoshop Sketch is the new addition, and even if it does not offer some of the latest features (it doesn't yet, at least), it's a worthy rival to other creatives.
