Clinical pathology has evolved from a series of discrete tests, each with different modalities for interpretation, to an integral function within a team approach to the diagnosis and management of complex conditions. The acquisition of clinical pathology experience was traditionally the realm of the most senior pathologist; however, this role has changed and includes interaction with the most junior member of the team in both hospital and community settings. Clinical pathology plays a central role in the diagnosis of many disease entities, from simple to complex, and in the evaluation of the efficacy of treatment. The trained pathologist has an essential role to play in the diagnosis and monitoring of most subspecialties that are not covered by cytopathology. Currently, laboratory medicine is moving towards greater integration within the full range of health care, and
